Not illustrated. 1837 Excerpt: .for a brief period, entirely dependent on the reflex power of the spinal cord. The sound of crying it must be further remembered, is nothing but a mechanical effect; it is, also, one of the phenomena of respiration, a process which is unquestionably capable of being effected without the agency of sensation and volition; and, although it is true there are many other functions, such as voice and speech, equally connected with the respiratory process, which are purely the effects of volition; yet it is quite consistent with the character of the excited movements in general, to conclude that this particular action, crying, is excited, and not voluntary. For, as it has been proved, that the application of fire to the skin excites violent motions when no sensation exists, it may in the same manner be concluded, that the exposure of the surface of the new born animal to the stimulating effect of the atmosphere, and to the impressions of various surrounding bodies, may induce that particular combination of the respiratory muscles, by which the sound of crying is produced, without the agency of feeling. The essential object of this cry or vagitus, is not to express a painful, but an injurious impression, and in this manner to attract the notice of the mother, whose ever watchful care is the substitute beneficently provided by the Creator, for that total absence of self protection, so conspicuous in those new born animals, in which the vagitus is observed....
